

As soon as the Wisconsin state no-call list went into effect, my family's evenings became more pleasant as the telemarketers went silent, ...absolutely silent. There is absolutely no indication that I have missed one single business transaction as a result of the Wisconsin law, and I would hate to switch to the laxer Federal no-call protection.

I would have thought that the state's rights argument in which the rights of the citizens of Wisconsin to legislate their freedoms would trump the rights of telemarketers from around the nation to call, just because the US Congress had enacted other rules. Anyway, the telemarketers shouldn't really want to call me... I won't buy anything and I'll just waste their time.
